What is Special Accreditation?

Special Accreditation is the process by which organizations not in consultative status with UN ECOSOC may apply and become eligible to participate in a United Nations High-level event or conference. The special accreditation process is mandated by the United Nations General Assembly and managed by the UN Non-governmental Liaison Service (NGLS) in the Department of Global Communications.

To apply for special accreditation, organizations must complete the application for each meeting or conference. Individuals may not apply for special accreditation.

How does the special accreditation application process work?

- The representative of an organization submits the application through the UN's web portal, INDICO.
- Once received, NGLS reviews the application.
- NGLS collects a list of all the organizations that meet the criteria (laid out in the event/conference resolution) and sends the list of eligible organizations to the Office of the President of the General Assembly (OPGA).
- OPGA circulates the list of organizations to UN Member States for approval or objection.
- If UN Member States approve the organizations, they will be informed via email through the INDICO portal.

What happens after special accreditation applications are approved?

When an organization has been accredited, the representative who applied for accreditation will be informed about the opening of the event registration. Organizations that are accredited will be able to nominate individuals to participate in the event or conference as representatives of the organization.

Nominated representatives from an accredited organization must create an INDICO account and register themselves for the event. Each individual must submit their own registration application. Approved representatives will receive a confirmation email via INDICO.
